Note If you have a stock photo of a business card sitting in your collection of resources, you can use that image as a starting point. Figure 2-1. If you're a budding graphic artist and want to create that great business card image, here's one way to do it. First, create a new document. In this example, the background is white. A transparent layer is created at the top for the business card—or whatever image you'd like to replicate. Then use the layer's Adjustments dialog box to make a few adjustment choices, like the ones in Figure 2-2. If you have an image of a business card, you can use that image as a guide to create the image in your new document. Start with a basic setting like the one here and then tweak it as needed. * A logo : To create an eye-catching logo design, use your image editing skills to create a new document in the right size, then apply a few adjustments to make the image look its best. Just like with a business card, there are plenty of reasons you might create your own logo design, like making changes to match a color scheme or adding an extra graphic element. Figure 2-2. Use the Adjustments layer to tweak the colors on a bitmap image. In this example, the image was adjusted to produce a brighter version of the image with more contrast. * Illustrations : If you need to create an image that features a drawing, collage, or other illustration, use your image editing skills to create a new document in the right size, then apply a few adjustments to make the image look its best. Like business cards and logos, you can create your own illustrations if you want to make sure they're perfect.

The present invention relates to an image reproduction system for reading an image recorded on an original or a printing plate and reproducing it on a record medium, which is capable of reproducing an image in extremely high fidelity. Various systems which employ such a technique as electrophotography, as a method of reproducing an image have heretofore been suggested. In particular, a system has been developed, in which an image electrostatically formed on a surface of a charged photoconductive material is transferred, by electric force, to a charged recording medium such as an organic or inorganic electrophotographic material and is then fixed to the recording medium so as to produce a print. In general, such a photoconductive material is made of zinc oxide doped with a small amount of cadmium and the like. It has recently been proposed to use an organic photoconductor which is prepared by dispersing an organic photoconductor in a binder resin as a photoconductive material in place of such an inorganic photoconductor. In this case, it is also made possible to produce an image on an organic photoconductor by making use of a variety of compounds, such as azo pigments, dyes, polycyclic quinone pigments and the like. The inventors of the present invention have studied the above-described electrophotography and have found that, in order to effectively transfer an image from a photoconductor to a recording material, the surface of a photoconductor should not be made very smooth, or the surface should have irregularities. As a result of their study, they have found that a highly adherent, smooth surface of a photoconductor, as well as a high development voltage and a prolonged development period, results in a high intensity of the electric field. Thus, the electric field is intensified as desired, and an image can be satisfactorily transferred from the photoconductor to a recording medium (such as a transfer film). As a result of their studies, the inventors of the present invention have discovered that, when an image is reproduced, a fully satisfactory image can be obtained by charging the surface of the photoconductor to at least 3,000 V and developing the surface of the photoconductor for a period of 1.2 to 3 minutes by use of a two-component developer having a known toner concentration. A problem encountered with the known image reproduction method will be described in detail. As is well known in the art, a toner image is produced on a photoconductor

Arizona Lawmakers Want to Ban Pornographic-Laced Movies The story has gained traction across the world and in our own Arizona state, where adult film producers say they are concerned about upcoming legislation that would ban erotic or pornographic-laced movies that are played at theaters. And lest you wonder, this is no simple issue. The big question now is if legislators plan on addressing that issue, will it be by creating new legislation or revoking the state’s film tax incentive? Here’s what they’re thinking: may be the one who causes these incidents on purpose. However when it comes to a real life situation, what’s more important is that the person who will end up suffering from the consequences of the incident has to be restored to a normal healthy state of being. We have to see that the violence itself is not the problem and then we have to be careful that as a society we do not get into the habit of seeing this as a result of the political or societal system of a particular individual. This does not have to be a long drawn out process if we want to restore a person to normalcy. So long as a person is able to undertake what I call a consciousness raising process that means that they are able to see that they have a certain responsibility for the harm that they do to themselves and others and the society at large is not responsible for that harm. The society is responsible but the person must take responsibility as well. So they have to go through a process of the learning to see how they might be able to abandon their own self-destructive patterns and we are at a disadvantage when we have no framework like this because there is no way of seeing that type of thing. So a lot of these things are actually very central to the growth of the person because as a society we all believe that we will grow by making ourselves better people. So any form of violence just simply proves that this is not true. That’s why we do not grow by becoming worse people, we grow by becoming better people. So we do not grow by causing more suffering or imposing our will on others. We grow by learning to see more clearly what we are doing and then being willing to learn how to do this differently.
