Full description: A simple program to remove any key press operations, if done in a Windows context. This means that you can assign a key combo like CTRL-H to any key on your keyboard, and it won't show up on the screen. To accomplish this, we created our own low-level Keyboard Manager HID-based driver that intercepts all input and stops them. When you press any key on your keyboard, our driver registers a key press event, and only then it allows the input to pass through. As far as we are aware, there's nothing in the Windows API to achieve this. For example, you can use SetWindowsHookEx() but it only lets you hook to keyboard presses, and only at a low level. Also, you cannot do it at a higher level without using Windows API in a low-level way. Finally, to make sure the driver is working right, we created a software keyboard simulation with DirectInput that only registers the key presses in a simulated way. With this, we can test our driver, and also test if we are intercepting the correct key presses. So as a result, we've created the following functionality: 1. Support for up to 32 software keyboard simulated keys. 2. Support for all keys on the keyboard. 3. All key presses are register on a 32-bit level. 4. Keyboard simulated key presses are intercepted, but this is being tested. KeyPressDescription: Simple to use key press remover. Create a simple text file with the details of the key combo you want to remove. Then, run KeyPressDescription.exe and follow instructions. This process removes any key combo from the registry.
