The effect is most pronounced in smaller towns where there are only a handful of non-affiliated residences. The study comes just as the FBI releases statistics on the number of homicides by the suspected killers as well as the number of homicides where the killer remains unknown. The data are for the period between 1979 and 2007. The researchers suggest that in such small towns, the limited number of non-affiliated residences means that the killer must know the victim. If the killer knows the victim, the researchers say the victims “are likely to have been familiar with the victim, and hence are likely to have been murdered by a known assailant.” In addition, people often hide a great deal of b7e8fdf5c8
