Follow us The Texas Tribune and ProPublica are teaming up to create a database of campaign contributions in an effort to shine a light on how big money influences elections. The data comes from The Center for Responsive Politics and will be available at no cost to interested readers. "What we're doing is transparent about who gives money to candidates and what they say about issues. There is a ton of data out there about campaign contributions, but it's all secret," said Mark Anderson, director of the Sunlight Foundation, which will build the database. "It tells us who's contributing. It tells us where the money is coming from and what they're trying to get out of it." The Tribune is looking for help distributing the data. ProPublica, a nonprofit news organization that relies on donations and grants, will provide the digital platform that will allow for more complex analysis, Anderson said. "We're seeing that the database can be used for more sophisticated analysis," he said. "So that will be helpful in understanding who donated what to whom." Campaign finance laws are written to ensure that large contributors can't hold undue influence over elected officials. But the details of the process have left voters in the dark about who has been spending so much money to influence elections. A recent study by the Sunlight Foundation found that 93 percent of contributions to all 435 congressmen came from just 2 percent of contributors. In Texas, 96 percent of contributions came from just 2 percent of contributors. "It's alarming to me that a few people are donating millions of dollars and no one knows who they are," said Representative Eddie Lucio III, a Democrat who will chair the House Committee on State Affairs if the Democrats win the chamber. The Tribune plans to release the data in the coming months. While OpenSecrets currently publishes a database of campaign contributions, it doesn't reveal who is donating the money. The database will show that certain industries are donating more money. ProPublica's campaign finance database 595f342e71
